Cases

The Meaning of Marriage

581 Until marriage the changes in a man's life have been in the nature of 585 an ordered sequence of development from a child to be cared for — the only 342 time in his life when a father, without inhibition, showers on him his love
[593] and affection — to one who, by degrees, makes an increasing contribution to a production unit. Marriage necessitates that a man pitch a tent for himself. With a tent he becomes a potential host and protector of others. The local idiom for marriage is "to set up a tent." It would be quite improper to use [196] the verb "to marry" when inquiring whether a marriage has taken place since this verb also has the meaning of "to have sexual intercourse." In-
• [195] stead the euphemism, "Have you pitched a tent?" is used. The Arabic word for a tent in this context is Bait. It is not used to refer to a military tent, nor to the small tent which shelters only a widow. It is reserved for the Bedouin tent, which usually has a wool top, and, most importantly, holds the promise of the continuation of life, whether it shelters a newly married couple, a mature family or young unmarried people. (The word Bait represents a complex concept, and it would be too much of a diversion here to discuss the various points of its significance. It is essential to understand that its [1178] meaning is not confined to a tent in the physical sense.) Its top has Baraka (divine goodness) in it; the quality of Haram, which makes it possible for the tent to be used as a sanctuary, is associated with it and this quality of Haram extends, moreover, to the ropes of the tent, so that anyone who clutches them comes under the protection of the owner. In it, the wife must permanently reside and her husband has the legal right to insist on this. In it too, he has the legal right of sexual access to a woman, his wife. Any children born in it he can claim as his own. With the erection of a tent the son [885] reaches adulthood, and it is in this sense that he can be said to have acquired a domain of his own.

581 Marriage gives a son greater freedom and less dependence on his father 585 in another sense. A second euphemism used for marriage is "making a [593] relationship," specifically an affinal one. Relationships between a man and [195] his father-in-law are diverse and are used in various ways in different situations. Here, the particular aspect which needs to be stressed is that a man
606 can cajole his father-in-law, and (through his wife) wealth, in the form
425 of animals, may pass from the former to the latter. Reciprocal gifts are passed 556 between affines on certain occasions, but in addition small amounts may pass which are not connected with the formal occasions of exchanges. Debt
583 lies between them. It begins with the initiation of marriage negotiations, 584 when the suitor's kinsmen take a prescribed number of sheep to present to 606 the girl's father if negotiations are successful. They promise to transfer bride-wealth[9] to the girl's father. A few weeks after the marriage, the hus-

[191] [9] I use the word "bride-wealth" because it has become so familiar in the literature, but the only similarity between the Sahiba of the Bedouin and the bride-wealth of